40 Years of Conservation

- Wisconsin hosts 400,000 breeding ducks that produce 50–70% of the fall duck harvest.
- Nearly 75% of the state's wetlands are privately held, containing the 1 - 5 acre wetlands preferred by breeding pairs.

Wisconsin's private land wetlands are important to autumn success afield. Nearly half of the birds harvested by state waterfowlers are hatched in Wisconsin's privately-held wetlands. WWA has restored nearly 10,000 acres of wetlands.

Woody Time

Generations of WWA volunteers (and their families) have built, installed, and maintained thousands of wood duck boxes. Over time, many have been decommissioned, but currently WWA has over 650 boxes under active management. These efforts put over 4,000 hatchlings on the ground annually. Notably, Wisconsin's wood duck population has grown at 6% over the past 30 years.

Recently, WWA volunteers developed a curriculum to engage middle-schooler science students by exploring the life cycle of the photogenic wood duck, tracking migration via GPS, then building and installing a wood duck box near school.

It's a Process

As winter snows retreat in March, new WWA restoration projects are exposed that were completed over winter. But that grand reveal has been preceded by months or years of planning and preparation before construction. Each location's unique characteristics is considered by WWA ecologists to create an appropriate design, but all follow a similar process.

WWA Abrams Property

If you find yourself in NE Wisconsin near Abrams, stop by WWA's 150-acre property for a stroll through uplands, marsh and streams. Over a mile of groomed trails and six hunting blinds are accessible to all without reservation. Local schools frequent the property for ecology and science. WWA's local chapter has cared for and improved this property since receiving it from the state in the early 2000's.

Floodplain Reconnection

Pecatonica River

Some WWA restorations do not result in a marsh.

Modern development and agricultural practices drain more stormwater into small streams and rivers, undercutting and exposing banks that are more subject to erosion with each heavy rain event. In this vicious cycle, deeper streambeds are further from the adjacent floodplains that historically served to retain stormwaters.

This project in southwest Wisconsin reconnected the Pecatonica River with its historic flood plain, reducing sedimentation transport while creating ephemeral wetlands important to wildlife, including waterfowl and providing community benefits like reduced flooding, cleaner drinking water, groundwater recharge.

Follow the money

Wetland restoration is not cheap.

Funding restorations starts with membership dollars, but that's only part of the story. The state Waterfowl Stamp fund, federal North American Wetlands Conservation Act (NAWCA), and other public and private foundations support WWA restoration projects. A single dollar from a member becomes $3 to $4 dollars as WWA obtains restoration grants.

WWA was a leader in the 2020 effort to raise the price of the state duck stamp for the first time since 1997, making more restoration funds available. The original artwork for the stamps shown ('95 and '98) was donated to WWA by the artist's son. Monies raised through their sale helps sustain WWA restorations into the future.

The Waterfowler's Arc

It's a common progression.

From newbie to harvester to experience-seeker then passionate conservationist. With a conscious nod to Aldo Leopold, WWA programs encourage and accelerate advancement along this "waterfowler's arc":

- Learn-to-hunt program,
- Monthly newsletter
- Adopted wildlife areas,
- The Waterfowl Hunters EXPO (on 26 August!)
- State-level, mission-focused committees.

Get your fingernails dirty

Increasingly, volunteers want to make a physical difference in the marshes or public properties they frequent. This may include hanging nesting structures, but it may also include helping the DNR manage their properties in a program called Adopt-a-Wildlife Area (AWA).

Chapters collaborate with DNR property managers or local municipalities to improve local wildlife areas: removing invasive plant species, raising purple loosestrife-attacking beetles, assisting in prescribed burns, developing nesting platforms for endangered Black Tern, and helping with duck banding.

Manoomin

The Anishinaabeg (Ojibwe) people call it Manoomin—“the good berry”—and it has cultural importance. It is also an unparalleled source of fuel for waterfowl as it ripens in late summer.

For 15 years, WWA ecologists have worked to expand wild rice’s modern range, collecting seed from existing stands of rice and sowing it in suitable waters. Students participate and learn the importance of Manoomin to humans and wildlife.

WWA’s wild rice role is expanding thru a partnership with the DNR and Great Lakes Indian Fish and Wildlife Commission (GLIFWC). This collaboration will expand rice restoration in Wisconsin’s Ceded Territories.

2023 saw a significant expansion of WWA's partnership with the Wisconsin Department of Natural Resources (DNR). An agreement will bring WWA wetland restoration experience and capacity to DNR properties in eastern Wisconsin. In the Lake Michigan basin alone, this includes an estimated 170,000 acres of restorable wetlands!

This builds on successful partnerships with other organizations, like WWA's work with the US Fish and Wildlife Service's private lands program. Here, WWA leverages its resources for grants which have resulted in > 1,700 acres of restored wetlands and associated uplands.

The Future of Conservation

Wisconsin has not experienced the sharp waterfowler decline of neighboring states, but numbers are trending down. Duck hunter energy and funds are critical to wetland conservation (think: duck stamp funds, volunteer effort, Pittman-Robertson tax dollars), so what does that decline mean for the future of wetlands?

Expanding the community of duckhunters is a conservation imperative. Persons of all walks must be encouraged to join the ranks of state waterfowlers. This is a WWA commitment to the future of wetland conservation.
